Xyólheméylh announces winners in social distancing art & video contest

Indigenous kids create unique messages of protection against COVID-19

May 6, 2020

In April Xyólheméylh asked all Indigenous children and youth in British Columbia to create posters and videos to describe their feelings about social distancing and COVID-19.

"We organized the contest to connect with children and youth who may be feeling a myriad of emotions during this strange time and to provide them with an outlet to express their feelings," said Kyla Darby, Executive Director of Programs. "The entries showed a lot of creativity, heart and talent."

Many of the entries expressed unique concerns about the arrival of the COVID-19 pandemic. In particular, concerns about the safety of Elders who carry our history and teachings was a common theme.

The winners were chosen by a panel consisting of the members of the FVACFSS Board of Directors and Elders Advisory Committee. "We received many artistic, creative and thoughtful entries and it was a real challenge to pick a top three. To our young artists thank you for sharing your work and please keep sharing your excellent artistry. The Board is honoured to have been part of this and we extend our heartfelt appreciation to all who participated and our congratulations to the prize winners," said Marion Mussell, Board of Directors President.

The winners received cash prizes and their art will be displayed in Xyólheméylh's offices. The agency received many excellent submissions and are proud to announce the following winners:
